TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGES.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENTS.]

BATHURST.

TUESDAY, 5 P.M.

ACCOUNTS from the rush at the Weddell Mountains speak very favourably of the diggings. There are said to be two thousand miners there, and a township has been started which extends for miles in length. There is no water nearer than four miles, and there is only a scanty supply, which is sold at 4d. per bucket. The diggers are constructing dams in readiness for the next rain. The sinking averages from 20 to 60 feet, and fair prospects have been obtained. This new rush is expected to prove equal to Lambing Flat.

The Western Mining Company loaded yesterday their first fine copper, viz., seven and a half tons. It is expected to pass through Bathurst to-day.

ARMIDALE.

TUESDAY, 5 P.M.

John Martin, a half-caste, was committed for trial to-day for stealing the horse for which Stanley was sentenced to five years' imprisonment at the last assizes. The half-caste was seen taking the horse.

It has been raining all day.

ST. PAUL'S AUXILIARY CHURCH SOCIETY.

The tenth annual meeting of this society was held on Monday evening last, in the Schoolroom, Cleveland-street. The attendance was good, and the Bishop of Sydney presided.

Proceedings were commenced with prayer, after which the chairman called upon the honorary secretary, Mr. Joseph Cook, to read the following:

Report.

The St. Paul's Auxiliary to the Church Society has now reached its tenth anniversary.

Your committee have to report that during the last year the subscriptions received have amounted to £192 lbs., making the total amount to the parsony society £1,000 10s. Although this amount may appear large, yet when it is divided over a space of ten years, it would leave only about £100 per annum contributed by each member, and it is to be regretted that it is far from being a satisfactory amount to be collected in so large a parish as Redfern and Chippendale for so great and noble a purpose.

Many contributions have been received from the members of Church work has been undertaken amongst them, and that has been almost altogether accomplished by the parishioners themselves; but, notwithstanding, there might have been a great deal more.

Pray believe me, your faithful servant,

EDWARD NIGHTINGALE.

Any communication to the above address is forwarded to me immediately if not there.—F. N.

THE MAN IN POSSESSION.—A STORY OF MYSORE.

(From the Full N.Y. Gazette, September 26.)

At the close of the last century the British army in India, commanded by General Harris, and directed by the youthful energies of Lord Cornwallis, advanced upon Srirangapatnam, the great stronghold of Mysore, captured it by assault, and killed Tippoo Sultan, the Mohometan usurper of the kingdom, and his son, the heir to the throne. Associated with us in this enterprise were the troops of the Nizam, the great chief of Hyderabad, in the Deccan, the mutual retainers of whose alliance with the English in this conjuncture were greater than its physical effects, for the hard and dangerous work of fighting fell chiefly upon our own regiments. It was an old feud. A war but half finished in the time of Lord Cornwallis was then brought to a close. For many years there had been an English colony in the part of the English in India to subdue this. But he was "Citizen Tippoo," and over and above his own colonial rights to our countrymen he had been in a manner identified with revolutionary France; he flaunted the "cap of liberty," and was growing into an Oriental Napoleon. In such circumstances, it was not strange that the English in India were eager for the overthrow of Tippoo, and had moreover strong sympathies in favour of the deposed Hindoo dynasty of Mysore. They knew well, and they cared little, that dynastic but to the legitimacy of any kind was to be hate revolutionary France. Even in the first war we find General Meadows writing to Lord Cornwallis—"I mean that the three Governors (English), the Nizam, and the Peishwah should unite at Seringsapatnam, with the old Queen of Mysore sitting at the head of the table. For my own part I freely confess that I should prefer the dignity and justice of destroying the old ruler, and uniting and restoring the kingdom to the Hindoo family of its own— to the wiser policy perhaps of only clipping his wings so effectually that he could soar no more in our time." What is here called the wiser policy was adopted, with the limitation of "our time." But after Meadows and Cornwallis had returned to England, Tippoo Sultan soared again; the opportunity so long enjoyed by the family of Hyder Ali and Tippoo Sultan became pensioners of the British Government, and the kingdom of Mysore lay prostrate at the feet of the conquerors.

The country might then, by right of conquest, have been divided between the British Government and the Nizam. But it was held that the moiety of the territory wrested from Tippoo would be inconveniently large, on administrative and political grounds, for either of the allies. There was, moreover, some of mutual feeling, of which we have spoken, still alive among the chief people of the English and the Nizam, a new, comparatively circumscribed, Hindoo principality in Mysore; and the legitimate representative of the old Rajah of the country, being then a child, was formally placed on the throne by the agents of the two Governments. A treaty known as the "Partition Treaty," between the English and the Nizam, gave the rights of the restored dynasty, and a second treaty, between the English and the Raah of Mysore, known as the "Subsidiary Treaty," fixed the relations between his Highness and the paramount State. It was a convenient arrangement for us at the time. It answered our purpose very well. It was in accordance with the declared policy of the British Government; and although the sagacity of the Governor-General may have foreseen the result, and some men, among whom was Thomas Munro, declaimed against our forbearance and indecision, was generally considered to be equally wise and judicious.

"A subsidiary treaty" is a treaty that secures the payment of a subsidy, or a certain sum of money, in return for which, in this case, the British Government were to furnish to Mysore the means, within and without, of military defence. In the event of any failure, or any imminent likelihood of failure on the part of Mysore to pay this money, the British Government had by treaty, the right to step in and assume the responsibility of its own security. It does not appear, however, to have been anticipated that this assumption was to be anything more than a temporary separation. The "man in possession" was to remain only until the debt had been paid, and something like security had been afforded, by the restoration of financial prosperity, for the payment, in successive years, of the annually accruing debt. During the minority of the young Prince, under the management of the famous administrator Purnesh, of Mysore were concerned. The subsidy was partially paid, and there was no thought of the principality. But soon after the Raah took the discretion of assent in his own hands, there were symptoms of disorganization, which continued to increase; the revenues fell off, and it was said that the subject was in greater danger. Whether this was actually the case, we are not told. But after a while the advisers of Lord William Bentinck persuaded him that the time had come for the right and administration of the British Government; and so the administration of Mysore was transferred to the hands of a commission of English officers, a sum fixed by treaty was annually paid to the Raah, and the surplus revenue were to be left to accumulate in the Mysore treasury. There are abundant proofs on the records of Government that neither in India nor in England did this represent more than a temporary separation. But years passed, and nothing restored; the revenues increased, the surplus increased. There was no debt—indeed, there never had been—any to the British Government; but "the man in possession" remained. It is said that Lord William Bentinck repented of what he had done, and spoke, after his return to England, of this act as the only one throughout his whole career the retrospect of which disturbed his conscience. But the Raah never ceased to hope and to believe that the government of the country would be restored to his hands.

We pass over a period of twenty years, taking no note of his opinions, or his endeavours to restore his power, and come to the time when, after the great mutinies or rebellions of 1857-58, the proclamation, in the Queen's name, of what was regarded by the natives of India as a new policy caused the Raah, then more than sixty years of age, to feel confident that a new era had been inaugurated, and that the disappointments of a third part of a century would soon cease to sicken his heart. During all the dark gloom of those misfortunes, he had given much trouble to the British alliance. He had great faith in the justice and generosity of Lord Canning. It seemed to him that the hour and the man both favoured the realisation of his hopes. He reassured, therefore, his claims with increased emphasis, and it is impossible to deny the logical force with which he argued his case. From the Government he had, however, been turned in due course to the Queen's Government, but not thinking that he could say was of any avail. The "man in possession" was a fixture in Mysore.

Then the Raah, who, for purposes of succession, is a childless man, and who is said by those who know him best to have wished that his sovereignty, in the event of his restoration, even for a day, should lapse to the British Government, straightway adopted a son with all due ceremonial formality. The argument against him had been that if he was not likely to live to see the day, then how was he likely to be strong in the day? But the Raah applied to his successor, whom the British Government might train and qualify for beneficial administration. The right of adoption, however, was refused as ruthlessly as the personal restoration; and in effect the Hindoo dynasty of Mysore has been declared to be extinct. On the death of the present nominal ruler, the territory is to become, unless the hand of annexation is now arrested, part and parcel of our British provinces in the East.

There is an outcry against this, as much on the part of the Queen as on the part of the Raah. It is affirmed, not merely by "interested agitators" on the one side, and "mainly sentimental" on the other, but by hard-headed men of ripe Indian experience, that this adverse decision is the greatest blunder that could be committed at the present time. Mysore is a fine country, but for all that "the game is not worth the candle." The princes and people of India have been taught to believe that the old annexation policy, which Lord Cranborne declared in the last speech, which he gave before his appointment to the Indian Ministry to have been one of the weightiest causes of the convulsions of 1857, has been irrevocably abandoned. We do not care to inquire what was the intention of that celebrated manifesto—with what restrictions it was furnished in, with what reservations and exceptions it was furnished in, of its original framers, or what constructions have been put upon it by later interpretation. In itself it has been accepted without any emanicipation, and it is not to be expected that the opinions of these experienced Indian statesmen who declare that, after such a declaration, the appropriation of the first Native State worth taking, that has fallen in our way, will be regarded as a rampant violation of the pledges and promises of the Queen. It is now too late to rectify this error. There are petitions now before Parliament which will compel notice, and Lord Cranborne has before him a golden opportunity of acquiring for himself new honours by looking the question fairly in the face, and removing the "man in possession."

FACTS ABOUT PEAS.—Pearls are obtained from a highly known as the pearl-oyster, found at great depth in the Indian seas. These oysters are of great size, measuring from nine to ten inches in diameter, and known to nature as the Murex persica. The larger pearls are usually found in the head of the fish, the smaller in the flesh. The deeper the water, according to the experience of the divers, the larger the pearls. Pearls are composed of a series of concentric layers, of a thin gelatinous membrane, alternating with layers of carbonate of lime (specific gravity 2.68), and are supposed to be concretions formed by a disease peculiar to the Circular Quay, and a well-known portion thereof, known as the Harbour Steamer's Wharf, Sydney Cove, at the north east side of Sydney Cove, for the term of three years, commencing on the 1st January, 1867, of the dues authorized to be collected at the Circular Quay, including the Harbour Steamer's Wharf, Sydney Cove, will be put up to auction for sale, in one lot, in the Hall of the Exchange, Bridge-street, Sydney.
